PREFAC[illegible]HE NEW EDITION

HE first edition of th[illegible]ry had the advantage of being published by the Delegates of the Oxfo[illegible]sity Press with the support of the Secretary of Ste for India in Coun[illegible] present greatly enlarged and improved work enjoy the same privileges [illegible]rst edition appeared in the summer of 1872 The extent of its indebte[illegible] the great seven volumed Sanskrit German Thesaurus compiled by th[illegible]minent German Sanskritists Otto Böhtlingk and Rudolf Roth with the [illegible]nce of many distinguished scholars such as Profsor A Weber of Berl[illegible] only completed as far as the beginning of the lette व v—was fully ackn[illegible] by me in the Preface

Having regard howeve[illegible] entire originality of the plan of my own work I d[illegible] not venture to describ[illegible]ed on the great Sanskrit German Wörterbuch For that plan I claimed to [illegible] responsible Every particle of its detail was thought out in my own m[illegible]the whole work was brought to completion by me with the co-operation[illegible] successive assistants—whose names were duly recorded—in about twelv[illegible]m the date of my election to the Boden Professorship in the Univ[illegible]Oxford

The words and the [illegible]f the words of a Dictionary can scarcely be proved by its compilers t[illegible]clusively to themselves It is not the mere aggregation of words and [illegible] but the method of dealing with them and arranging them which giv[illegible]onary the best right to be called an original production

In saying this I am [illegible]ng any superiority for my own method over that of the two great Ger[illegible]krit scholars—which of course has advantages of its own Nor am I de[illegible]ne whit from the tribute of admiration which I and other lexicographe[illegible]ways desirous of rendering to the colossal monument of industry and [illegible]hip represented by their work I am merely repeating my claim to the [illegible]n of a Sanskrit English Dictionary on a wholly unique plan—a plan the uti[illegible]hich has been now proved by experience

It was not thought de[illegible]o print off more than a thousand copies of the first edition of my book [illegible] notwithstanding the necessarily high publishing price—were sold off in a fe[illegible] It then became a question as to how the continuous demand for the [illegible]nary was to be met and the Delegates decided to provide for it by a s[illegible]entary facsimile edition produced by a photo-lithographic process Copie[illegible]ted by that process have been procurable ever since Of course I was well [illegible]ed with the factual evidence thus afforded of the general trustworthiness of the present Dictionary, its cmpilers can yet be keenly alive to its thoroughly human character.

Speaking for myself I may say that blended wi my thankfulness for the longevity that has enabled me to see a protracted uncrtaking brought to a completion, is a deep consciousness that I am not youngenough to consider myself infallible Indeed it is at once the joy and sorrow ofevery true scholar that the older he grows the more he has to confess himself a learer rather than a teacher, and the more morbidly conscious he becomes of his own liabity to a learner's mistakes.

From all true scholars I do not fear, but cort, criticism Such critics will understand how a sense of responsibility may icrease with advancing age, putting an author out of conceit with his own perforiances, and filling him with progressively intensified cravings after an impossible erfection. They will make due allowance for the difficulties besetting the prouction of so many densely printed pages, often comprising column after column unbroken serried type, and abounding with countless dots and diacritical marks. Nor will they be surprised at occasional inequalities of execution in a work representin efforts spread over numerous years Nor will they need to be reminded that occasioal distractions, trials of health and weariness of spirit are unavoidably incident, not oly to the responsible head of a prolonged undertaking, but to his several assistants. Indeed it is no disparagement to those who have contributed to the detail of thi work to admit that a compilation, which is the result of the collaboration of so mny different personalities, must in some degree reflect the idiosyncrasies and infirmitiesieculiar to each.

Yet notwithstanding my desire that due weigt should be given to such considerations, I may be pardoned if I express myconfident expectation that the volume now offered to students of both Sanskrit nd comparative philology, will supply them with the most complete and usefu one-volumed Sanskrit-English Dictionary ever yet produced — a Dictionary, too,which in its gradual progress has, I trust, kept pace with the advancing knowled and scholarship of the day.

At all events I feel sure that I may affirm fomy collaborators, as well as for myself, that we have earnestly striven to secu for this new volume, even more than for the old, the possession of four pncipal characteristics, namely:— 1. Scholarly accuracy, 2 Practical utility, 3 Lucity of arrangement, designed to set forth, as clearly as possible, the etymologica structure of the language, and its bearing on that of the cognate languages o Europe, 4. Completeness and comprehensiveness, at least to the fullest extent ttainable in the latest state of Sanskrit research, and to the utmost limit copatible with compactness and compression into a single volume.

And here it is my duty to notify, in justiceas much to my assistants as to myself, that I must be held primarily responsibl not only for the plan, but for the general character of the whole Dictionary. This will be understood when I state that I have from the first exercised strict superintendence over the details of both editions—not only in carefully sIervising the manuscript, but in adding new words, in modifying or amplifying mnings, in subjoining explanations from my own literary notes—made during my ojourning at the chief seats of learning in India—in examining and re-examinin every proof-sheet

I ought to state, however, that during occashal attacks of illness I have been compelled to trust more to [illegible] collaborators than at other times[1] and I must also make an exception in regard [illegible] the Additions the abundance of which is justifiable by the circumstance that [illegible] of them are taken from texts and books published quite recently For althou[illegible] a manuscript list of all the words and meanings in the supplementary pages was [illegible]bmitted for my approval and although many words in the list have been eli[illegible]ated by me while others have been added from my own notes yet the necess[illegible] for passing the worst winter months in a Southern climate has made it impos[illegible]le for me to have at hand every new book needed for the verification of ever[illegible] addition which I have allowed to be retained

With regard to a str[illegible]y personal criticism in which I have for many years been content to acquiesce [illegible]ithout comment I may perhaps advantageously—now that I have nearly arrive[illegible] at the end of my career—make a brief explanation Some of my critics and a [illegible] candid friends have expressed surprise that I should have devoted so much of [illegible] long tenure of the Boden Professorship to the dry dreary and thankless dru[illegible]ry of writing Dictionaries and Grammars and to practical researches carried [illegible] among the Pandits of India in their own country rather than to the duty o[illegible]roving the profundity of my learning and my fitness to occupy a high Professo[illegible] position by editing or translating obscure Sanskrit texts which have never bee[illegible]dited or translated before[2]

In explanation I must dr[illegible] attention to the fact that I am only the second occupant of the Boden Chair, and that [illegible] Founder Colonel Boden stated most explicitly in his will (dated August 15 1811) [illegible]t the special object of his munificent bequest was to promote the translation of the [illegible]riptures into Sanskrit so as to enable his countrymen to proceed in the conversion o[illegible]e natives of India to the Christian Religion[3]

It was on this account [illegible]t, when my distinguished predecessor and teacher Professor H H Wilson was [illegible]candidate for the Chair in 18[illegible]2 his lexicographical labours were put forward as [illegible] principal claim to election

Surely then it need no[illegible] thought surprising if following in the footsteps of my venerated master I h[illegible] made it the chief aim of my professorial life to provide facilities for the tran[illegible]on of our sacred Scriptures into Sanskrit[4] and for

[1] I cannot allow myself to think that [illegible] Dictionary has suffered much from this cause [illegible] perhaps during the collaboration of the late D[illegible] [illegible]berg the rapid impairment of whose powers did [illegible] [illegible]s strike me so as to make me aware of the necess[illegible] increased vigilance on my part (see p xxxi).

[2] I believe it is held that for an A[illegible] [illegible]imber to establish a reputation for mountaineer[illegible] must ascend some peak, however compara[illegible]vel[illegible] [illegible]nificant, that has never been ascended before [illegible] [illegible]e appli[illegible]cation of such a principle as a sole proof [illegible] [illegible]olarship in the present day can no more hold go[illegible] Sanskrit than in Greek and Latin At all event[illegible] any one who claims a reputation for superior s[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] that seek ground association with Indian [illegible] [illegible] in their own country and he will find out that far [illegible] [illegible] people of his knowledge and acquirements will [illegible] [illegible] of him then

[3] Lieutenant Colonel Boden of the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] retired to [illegible] [illegible] 1807 and died [illegible] [illegible] Nov 21 1811 His daughter died [illegible] [illegible] 18[illegible]7 whereupon his bequest passed to the University of Oxford but the first election to the Chair for some reason unknown to me did not take place till 1832

In his address proposing himself for election to the Boden Electors, Professor H H Wilson laid stress on what he had done for the rendering of Scripture Terms into the Sanskrit language It was doubtless on this account that after he was elected he [illegible] to compile an English-Sanskrit Dictionary—a work never before attempted. I laboured at this for about seven years and although the [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] thick volume by the Directors of the East India Company in 1851) cannot I fear be said to meet the needs of the present day yet it should be borne in mind that it was pioneer work. Nor can it be said to have been useless, seeing that seven years [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] Sanskrit tendered by the Rev J Wenger [illegible] [illegible] of the [illegible] [illegible] Sanskrit and [illegible] of Dr Yates Sanskrit [illegible] the promotion of a better knowledge of the religions [illegible]d customs of India, as the best key to a knowledge of the religious needs of ou[illegible] great Eastern Dependency. My very first public lecture delivered after my election i[illegible] 1860 was on 'The Study of Sanskrit in Relation to Missionary Work in India' [illegible]ublished in 1861).

For the rest, I have already alluded to the adv[illegible]tage which this Dictionary has derived from the support of the Governments [illegible] India, and I ought here to acknowledge with gratitude that, without the su[illegible]idy granted by successive Secretaries of State in Council, the present volume [illegible]uld not have been sold to the public at the price at which it is now offered. In regard to the Oxford University Press it will be sufficient to say that this [illegible]lume adds to the countless evidences of its efficiency and of the wealth of its resources. But I may be permitted to congratulate its Delegates and Controll[illegible] on their good fortune in possessing an unrivalled Oriental Press-reader in M[illegible] Pembrey. For more than forty years he has read the final proofs of all my bo[illegible]s, and I can from my own experience, and without exaggeration, affirm, that I [illegible]oubt whether any one can surpass him in the perfection to which he has broug[illegible] the art of detecting errors due to the inadvertence of both authors and printers

It is only necessary for me to add that havin[illegible] been alone responsible for the singularity of the plan of the original Dictiona[illegible], I thought it desirable to prefix to the first edition several sections of intro[illegible]ctory explanations. In the same way my supremacy in the production of the pre[illegible]nt new work necessitates my undertaking the responsibility of writing a new series o[illegible] explanations, in which I have deemed it desirable to pursue the main lines of m[illegible] previous method, and not to discard any portion of the old matter which could be a[illegible]antageously retained

POSTSCRIPT.

This Dictionary, to which my father devoted so many years of labour, was completed by him a few days before his death, whi[illegible]h took place at Cannes, in the south of France, on April 11, 1899. It had been his hope to see this work published shortly after his return to England. Although this desire was not granted, it was a satisfaction to him to know that the last revise h[illegible]d received his final corrections, and that the book would be issued from the Uni[illegible]ersity Press within a few weeks of his death.

tionary'—'I received a copy of Professor Monier Williams' English and Sanskrit Dictionary at a time when I was about to commence a translation into Sanskrit of portions of the Old Testament I have used it daily for the last seven years, and the more I have consulted it the more excellent I have found it. I feel bound to say that he appears to have succeeded, not only beyond my previous ideas of what was likely, but also of what was feasible, to be accomplished at the present time The Pundits whom I employ have likewise expressed their unqualified admiration of the labour and erudit[illegible]n which his volume displays. The Rev. J. Parsons o[illegible] Benares, who has been engaged for some years pas[illegible] in preparing a new Hindee version of the New Test[illegible]ment, has likewise derived material assistance from Pro[illegible]ssor M. W.'s work Indian missionaries generally [illegible]e him a large debt of gratitude'

Let m[illegible] add that I hope the present Sanskrit-English Dictionar[illegible] will furnish some young scholar with materials [illegible]or the compilation of a far more satisfactory English-Sanskrit Dictionary than that which I began to comp[illegible] more than half a century ago.

INTRODUCTION

SECTION I

Statement of the circumstances which led to the peculiar System of Sanskrit Lexicography introduced for the first time in the Monier Williams Sanskrit English Dictionary of 1872

To enable me to give a clear account of the gradual development of the plan of the present work I must go back to its earliest origin and must reiterate what I stated in the Preface to the first edition that my predecessor in the Boden Chair Professor H H Wilson once intended to compile a Sanskrit Dictionary in which all the words in the language were to be scientifically arranged under about 2 000 roots and that he actually made some progress in carrying out that project. Such a scientific arrangement of the language would no doubt have been appreciated to the full by the highest class of scholars Eventually however he found himself debarred from its execution and commended it to me as a fitting object for the occupation of my spare time during the tenure of my office as Professor of Sanskrit at the old East India College Haileybury Furthermore he generously made over to me both the beginnings of his new Lexicon and a large MS volume containing a copious selection of examples and quotations (made by Pandits at Calcutta under his direction[1]) with which he had intended to enrich his own volume It was on this account that as soon as I had completed the English Sanskrit part of a Dictionary of my own (published in 1851) I readily addressed myself to the work thus committed to me and actually carried it on for some time between the intervals of other undertakings until the abolition of the old Haileybury College on January 1 1858

One consideration which led my predecessor to pass on to me his project of a root arranged Lexicon was that, on being elected to the Boden Chair he felt that the elaboration of such a work would be incompatible with the practical objects for which the Boden Professorship was founded[2]

Accordingly he preferred and I think wisely preferred to turn his attention to the expansion of the second edition of his first Dictionary[3]—a task the prosecution of which he eventually intrusted to a well known Sanskrit scholar the late Professor Goldstücker Unhappily that eminent Orientalist was singularly unpractical in some of his ideas and instead of expanding Wilson's Dictionary began to convert it into a vast cyclopædia of Sanskrit learning, including essays and controversial discussions of all kinds He finished the printing of 480 pages of his own work which only brought him to the word Arim-dama (p 87 of the present volume) when an untimely death cut short his lexicographical labours

As to my own course the same consideration which actuated my predecessor operated in my case when I was elected to fill the Boden Chair in his room in 1860

I also felt constrained to abandon the theoretically perfect ideal of a wholly root arranged Dictionary in favour of a more practical performance compressible within reasonable limits—and more especially as I had long become aware that the great Sanskrit German Wörterbuch of Böhtlingk and Roth was expanding into dimensions which would make it inaccessible to ordinary English students of Sanskrit

Nevertheless I could not quite renounce an idea which my classical training at Oxford had forcibly impressed upon my mind—viz. that the primary object of a Sanskrit Dictionary should be to exhibit by a lucid etymological arrangement the structure of a language which as most people know is not only the elder sister of Greek but the best guide to the structure of Greek, as well as of every other member of the Āryan or Indo European family—a language in short which is the very key stone of the science of comparative philology This was in truth the chief factor in determining the plan which as I now proceed to show I ultimately carried into execution

[1] This will be found in the Library presented by me to the Indian Institute Oxford.

[2] The main object was really a missionary one as I have shown in the Preface to this volume (p ix) and in my Life of H H Wilson appended to my Reminiscences of Old Haileybury College (published by A. Constable & Co)

[3] His first Dictionary was published in 1819 and his second in 1832 while he was a candidate for the Boden Professorship

And it will conduce to the making of what I have to say in this connexion clearer, if I draw attention at the very threshold to the fact that the Hindūs are perhaps the only nation, except the Greeks, who have investigated, independently and in a truly scientific manner, the general laws which govern the evolution of language

The synthetical process which comes into operation in the working of those laws may be well called saṃskaraṇa, 'putting together,' by which I mean that every single word in the highest type of language (called Samskṛita[1]) is first evolved out of a primary Dhātu—a Sanskṛit term usually translated by 'Root,' but applicable to any primordial constituent substance, whether of words, or rocks, or living organisms—and then, being so evolved, goes through a process of 'putting together' by the combination of other elementary constituents

Furthermore, the process of 'putting together' implies, of course, the possibility of a converse process of vyākaraṇa, by which I mean 'undoing' or 'decomposition,' that is to say, the resolution of every root-evolved word into its component elements So that in endeavouring to exhibit these processes of synthesis and analysis, we appear to be engaged, like a chemist, in combining elementary substances into solid forms, and again in resolving these forms into their constituent ingredients

It seemed to me, therefore, that in deciding upon the system of lexicography best calculated to elucidate the laws of root-evolution, with all the resulting processes of verbal synthesis and analysis, which constitute so marked an idiosyncrasy of the Sanskṛit language, it was important to keep prominently in view the peculiar character of a Sanskṛit root—a peculiarity traceable through the whole family of so-called Āryan languages connected with Sanskṛit, and separating them by a sharp line of demarcation from the other great speech-family usually called Semitic[2]

And here, if I am asked a question as to what languages are to be included under the name Āryan—a question which ought certainly to be answered in limine, inasmuch as this Dictionary, when first published in 1872, was the first work of the kind, put forth by any English scholar, which attempted to introduce comparisons between the principal members of the Āryan family—I reply that the Āryan languages (of which Sanskṛit is the eldest sister[3], and English one of the youngest) proceeded from a common but nameless and unknown parent, whose very home somewhere in Central Asia cannot be fixed with absolute certainty, though the locality may conjecturally be placed somewhere in the region of Bactria (Balkh) and Sogdiana, or not far from Bokhara and the first course of the river Oxus[4] From this centre radiated, as it were, eight principal lines of speech—each taking its own course and expanding in its own way—namely the two Asiatic lines · (A) the Indian—comprising Sanskṛit, the various ancient Prākṛits, including the Prākṛit of the Inscriptions, the Pāli[5] of the Buddhist sacred Canon, the Ardha-Māgadhī of the Jains, and the modern Prākṛits or vernacular languages of the Hindūs, such as Hindī, Marāṭhī, Gujarātī, Bengālī, Oriya &c (B) the Iranian—comprising the Avesta language commonly called Zand or Zend[6], old Persian or Akhæmenian, Pahlavī, modern Persian, and, in connexion with these, Armenian and Pushtu, and then the six European lines: (A) Keltic, (B) Hellenic, (C) Italic, (D) Teutonic, (E) Slavonic, (F) Lithuanian, each branching into various sub-lines as exhibited in the present languages of Europe It is this Asiatic and European ramification of the Āryan languages which has led to their being called Indo-European.

Now if I am asked a second question, as to what most striking feature distinguishes all these languages from the Semitic, my answer is, that the main distinction lies in the character of their roots

[1] Sanskṛit is now too Anglicized a word to admit of its being written as it ought to be written according to the system of transliteration adopted in the present Dictionary—Saṃskṛit.

[2] The name Semitic or Shemitic is applied to Assyrian, Hebrew, Aramaic (or Aramæan), Arabic, and Himyaritic, because in the tenth chapter of Genesis Shem is represented as father of the principal nations speaking these languages—e g Asshur (Assyria), Aram (Syria), and of Arphaxad, grandfather of Eber, from whom came the Hebrews—or Trans-Euphratian race, the name Hebrew coming from عبر, and really meaning 'one who lives beyond (a river)'—and Joktan, the father of many of the tribes inhabiting South Arabia. It is usual, too, to reckon among Semitic races the people of Abyssinia, whose ancient literary language is the Ethiopic or Ge'ez, while their spoken dialects are Tigré for the north and north-east, and Amharic for the centre and south, all presenting affinities with the ancient Himyaritic Arabic of South Arabia (Yaman) Hence, speaking generally, we may classify Semitic languages under the two heads of 1 'North Semitic,' comprising Assyrian, Hebrew, and Aramaic, 2 'South Semitic,' comprising Arabic, Himyaritic, and Ethiopic

[3] Though the younger sisters sometimes preserve older forms

[4] According to some German Theorists the cradle-land of the Āryans was in the steppes of Southern Russia Others have fantastically placed it in Northern Europe Most scholars hold to the old idea of 'somewhere in Central Asia,' and probably in the region of Bactria (Balkh) and Sogdiana, although there might have been a second centre of migration I myself firmly believe that Balkh was once a chief ancient home of Āryan civilization Its ruins are said to extend for twenty miles.

[5] See notes, p xxv, on Pāli and on the Prākṛit of the inscriptions

[6] As to the Avesta, commonly called Zend (more correctly Zand), this is that ancient language of Eastern Īrān in which are written the sacred books of the Zoroastrians, commonly called Zend Avesta—books which constitute the bible and prayer book of the Pārsīs—those fugitives from Persia who are scattered everywhere throughout India, and are now among the most energetic and loyal of our Indian fellow subjects or radical sounds; for although both Āryan and Semitic forms of speech are called 'inflective'[1], it should be well understood that the inflectiveness of the root in the two cases implies two very different processes.

For example, an Arabic root is generally a kind of hard tri-consonantal framework consisting of three consonants which resemble three sliding but unchangeable upright limbs, moveable backwards and forwards to admit on either side certain equally unchangeable ancillary letters used in forming a long chain of derivative words. These intervenient and subservient letters are of the utmost importance for the diverse colouring of the radical idea, and the perfect precision of their operation is noteworthy; but their presence within and without the rigid frame of the root is, so to speak, almost overpowered by the ever prominent and changeless consonantal skeleton. In illustration of this we may take the Arabic tri-consonantal root KTB, 'to write,' using capitals for the three radical consonants to indicate their unchangeableness: the third pers. sing. past tense is KaTaBa, 'he wrote;' and from the same three consonants, by means of certain servile letters, are evolved with fixed and rigid regularity a long line of derivative forms, of which the following are specimens:—KaTB and KiTāBat, 'the act of writing;' KāTiB, 'a writer;' maKTūB, 'written;' taKTīB, 'a teaching to write;' muKāTaBat and taKāTuB, 'the act of writing to one another;' mutaKāTiB, 'one engaged in mutual correspondence;' iKTāB, 'the act of dictating;' maKTaB, 'the place of writing, a writing school;' KiTāB, 'a book;' KiTBat, 'the act of transcribing.'

In contradistinction to this, a Sanskrit root is generally a single monosyllable[2] consisting of one or more consonants combined with a vowel, or sometimes of a single vowel only. This monosyllabic radical has not the same cast-iron rigidity of character as the Arabic tri-consonantal root before described. True, it has usually one fixed and unchangeable initial letter, but in its general character it may rather be compared to a malleable substance capable of being beaten out or moulded into countless ever-variable forms, and often in such a way as to entail the loss of one or other of the original radical letters; new forms being, as it were, beaten out of the primitive monosyllabic ore, and these forms again expanded by affixes and suffixes, and these again by other affixes and suffixes[3], while every so expanded form may be again augmented by prepositions, and again by compositions with other words, and again by compounds of compounds, till an almost interminable chain of derivatives is evolved. And this peculiar expansibility arises partly from the circumstance that the vowel is recognized as an independent constituent of every Sanskrit radical, constituting a part of its very essence, or even sometimes standing alone as itself the only root.

Take for example such a root as Bhū, 'to be' or 'to exist.' From this is, so to speak, beaten out an immense chain of derivatives, of which the following are a few examples:—Bhava or Bhavana, 'being;' Bhāva, 'existence;' Bhāvana, 'causing to be;' Bhāvin, 'existing;' Bhuvana, 'the world;' Bhū or Bhūmi, 'the earth;' Bhū-dhara, 'earth-supporter,' 'a mountain;' Bhū-dhara-ja, 'mountain-born,' 'a tree;' Bhū-pa, 'an earth-protector,' 'king;' Bhūpa-putra, 'a king's son,' 'prince,' &c. &c. Ud-bhū, 'to rise up;' Praty-a-bhū, 'to be near at hand;' Prōdbhuta, 'come forth,' &c.[4]

Sanskrit, then, the faithful guardian of old Indo-European forms, exhibits these remarkable properties better than any other member of the Aryan line of speech, and the crucial question to be decided was how to arrange the plan of my Dictionary in such a way as to make them most easily apprehensible.

On the one hand, I had to bear in mind that supposing the whole Sanskrit language to be referable to about 2,000 roots or parent-stems[5], the plan of taking root by root and writing, as it were, the biographies of two thousand parents with sub-biographies of their numerous descendants in the order of their growth and evolution, would be to give reality to a beautiful philological dream—a dream, however, which could not receive practical shape without raising the Lexicon to a level of scientific perfection unsuited to the needs of ordinary students.

On the other hand, I had to reflect that to compile a Sanskrit Dictionary according to the usual plan

[1] As distinguished from unchangeably monosyllabic, like the Chinese; and agglutinative, like the Drāvidian of Southern India, and like the Turkish and other members of an immense class of languages in which there are no so-called inflections, but merely affixes or suffixes glued, as it were, to the root or body of a word, and easily separable from it, and not blending intimately with it, and so, as it were, inflecting it.

[2] Of course it is well understood that there are in Sanskrit a certain number of dissyllabic roots, but I am here merely contrasting Semitic and Āryan roots generally.

[3] The prefixes of a root may be called its 'affixes,' and its verbal terminations &c. its suffixes.

[4] For other illustrations of this see [illegible] p. [illegible] p. 1100 [illegible] p. 1262 of this volume.

[5] The number of distinct Dhātus or radical forms given in some collections is 1,750; but as many forms having the same sound have different meanings, and are conjugated differently, they are held to be distinct roots, and the number is thereby swelled to 2,490. It should be noted too that a great many of these Dhātus are modifications or developments of simpler elements, and this Dictionary does not always decide as to which of two, three or more roots is the simplest, although when roots are allied their connection is indicated. Probably the real number of elementary radicals in Sanskrit might be reduced to a comparatively small catalogue—even, as some think, to a list of not more than about 120 primitive roots. Many Sanskrit roots have alternative Prākrit forms or vice versâ, and both forms are allowed to co-exist, as bhan and bhaṇ, dhan and dhaṇ, [illegible] and [illegible] others whose initials are aspirated consonants have passed into other aspirated consonants or have retained only the aspirate, as in bhṛ, dhṛ, dhvṛ, hvṛ, hṛ &c. Again, such a root as svad is probably nothing but a compound of su and root ad, and such roots as snih, snuh, snuh are plainly mere modifications of each other.

of treating each word as a separate and independent entity, requiring separate and independent explanation, would certainly fail to give a satisfactory conception of the structure of such a language as Sanskrit, and of its characteristic processes of synthesis and analysis, and of its importance in throwing light on the structure of the whole Indo-European family of which it is the oldest surviving member

I therefore came to the conclusion that the best solution of the difficulty lay in some middle course—some compromise by virtue of which the two lexicographical methods might be, as it were, interwoven

It remains for me to explain the exact nature of this compromise, and I feel confident that the plan of the present work will be easily understood by any one who, before using the Dictionary, prepares the way by devoting a little time to a preliminary study of the explanations which I now proceed to give

SECTION II

Explanation of the Plan and Arrangement of the Work, and of the Improvements introduced into the Present Edition

Be it notified, at the very threshold, that there are four mutually correlated lines of Sanskrit words in this Dictionary —(1) a main line in Nāgarī type, with equivalents in Indo-Italic type[1]; (2) a subordinate line (under the Nāgarī) in thick Indo-Romanic type[1]; (3) a branch line, also in thick Indo-Romanic type, branching off from either the first or the second lines with the object of grouping compound words under one head; (4) a branch line in Indo-Italic type, branching off from leading compounds with the object of grouping together the compounds of those compounds Of course all four lines follow the usual Sanskrit Dictionary order of the alphabet (see p xxxvi)

The first or main line, or, as it may be called, the 'Nāgarī line,' constitutes the principal series of Sanskrit words to which the eye must first turn on consulting the Dictionary It comprises all the roots of the language, both genuine and artificial (the genuine being in large Nāgarī type), as well as many leading words in small Nāgarī, and many isolated words (also in small Nāgarī), some of which have their etymologies given in parentheses, while others have their derivation indicated by hyphens.

The second or subordinate line in thick Indo-Romanic type is used for two purposes —(a) for exhibiting clearly to the eye in regular sequence under every root the continuous series of derivative words which grow out of each root, (b) for exhibiting those series of cognate words which, to promote facility of reference, are placed under certain leading words (in small Nāgarī) rather than under the roots themselves.

The third or branch line in thick Indo-Romanic type is used for grouping together under a leading word all the words compounded with that leading word

The fourth or branch Indo-Italic line is used for grouping under a leading compound all the words compounded with that compound

The first requires no illustration; the second is illustrated by the series of words under कृ 1 kri (p 300) beginning with 1 Krit, p. 301, col. 3, and under कर 1 kará (p 253) beginning with 1 Karaka (p 254, col. 1), the third by the series of compounds under कर 1. kará (p 253, col. 1), and Kárana (p. 254, col. 1), the fourth by the series of compounds under -vīra (p 253, col 3)

And this fourfold arrangement is not likely to be found embarrassing; because any one using the Dictionary will soon perceive that the four lines or series of Sanskrit words, although following their own alphabetical order, are made to fit into each other without confusion by frequent backward and forward cross-references. In fact, it will be seen at a glance that the ruling aim of the whole arrangement is to exhibit, in the clearest manner, first the evolution of words from roots, and then the interconnexion of groups of words so evolved, as members of one family descended from a common source. Hence all the genuine roots of the language are brought prominently before the eye by large Nāgarī type; while the evolution of words from these roots, as from parent-stocks, is indicated by their being printed in thick Romanic type, and placed in regular succession either under the roots, or under some leading word connected with the same family by the tie of a common origin. It will be seen, too, that in the case of such leading words (which are always in Nāgarī type), their etymology—given in a parenthesis—applies to the whole family of cognate words placed under them, until a new series of words is introduced by a new root or new leading-word in Nāgarī type In this way all repetition of etymologies is avoided, and the Nāgarī type is made to serve a very useful purpose

It will also be seen that words which are different in meaning, but appear identical in form, are distinguished

[1] I use the expressions 'Indo-Romanic' and 'Indo-Italic' to denote the expanded Roman and Italic alphabets adapted by the use of diacritical points and marks to the expression of Sanskrit and other Indian languages The thick Indo Romanic type employed in this volume is a product of the Oxford Clarendon Press, and therefore named Clarendon type from each other by the figures 1, 2, 3, &c. placed before the Indo-Romanic or Indo-Italic transliterated forms — see for example, अतीत 1 a-tîta, अतीत 2 atîta (p. 113)[1]; 1 Âpya, आप्य 2 âpya, आप्य 3 âpya (pp. 142, 144); बृह 1 bṛih, बृह 2 bṛih, बृह 3 vṛih (p. 735).

In regard to the roots of the language it will be observed that they are treated of in the present work—both in respect of the meanings and of the exhibition of tenses, participles, and verbal forms evolved from them—more thoroughly and exhaustively than has hitherto been attempted in a Dictionary[2].

Furthermore all the verbs formed from the roots with prepositions (as for example, अनुकृ anu-√kṛi, p. 31; समभिव्याहृ sam-abhi-vy-â-√hṛi, p. 1156) are arranged according to the method followed in Greek and Latin Lexicons, that is to say such verbs are to be looked for in their own alphabetical order, and not under the roots kṛi and hṛi. The practical convenience resulting from this method, and the great advantage of exhibiting the connexion of every verb and its meanings with its derivatives, constitute in my opinion an invaluable gain, especially to the student who studies Sanskṛit as he would Greek and Latin, and makes it a guide to the study of the other members of the Indo-European family. At all events it forms one of the unique features of the present work, stamping it with an individuality of its own, and differentiating it from all other Sanskṛit Dictionaries. The labour entailed in the process—necessarily a wholly pioneering process—of thus rearranging the verbs in a language so rich in prepositions can only be understood by those who have undergone it.

As to the separation of meanings it must be noted that mere amplifications of preceding meanings are separated by a comma, whereas those which do not clearly run into each other are divided by semicolons. A comma, therefore, must always be taken as marking separate shades of meaning except it occurs in parenthetical observations.

Let it be observed, however, that all the meanings of a word belonging to a group are not always given in full if they may be manifestly gathered from the other members of the group. This applies especially to participles and participial formations.

Observe too that all remarks upon meanings and all descriptive and explanatory statements are given between ( ); all remarks within remarks and comparisons with other languages between [ ].

I was told by a friendly critic soon after the appearance of the first edition, that meanings and synonyms had been needlessly multiplied; but when the book had been fairly tested by repeated and extended application to various branches of the literature, it was found that apparently superfluous synonyms often gave the precise meanings required to suit particular passages. In the present edition—to save space—some synonyms which seemed mere surplusage have been rejected, and I fear I may have occasionally gone too far in sanctioning some of these rejections. For experience proves that the practical utility of a Dictionary is less impaired by a redundancy than by a paucity of meanings.

Again a glance at the following pages will show that the arrangement of compound words under a leading word, as introduced in the edition of 1872, and continued with modifications in the present edition, is entirely novel.

It may perhaps be objected that there are too many of these compounds; but once more it may be urged that a Sanskṛit Dictionary must not be tried by ordinary laws in this respect, for Sanskṛit has developed more than Greek and German and any other Aryan language the faculty of forming compounds. The love of composition is indeed one of its most characteristic features. To exclude compounds from a Sanskṛit Lexicon would be so to speak to unsanskṛitize it. Not only are there certain compounds quite peculiar to Sanskṛit, but, in the grammar, composition almost takes the place of Syntax, and the various kinds of compound words are classified and defined with greater subtlety and minuteness than in any other known language of the world. When a student is in doubt whether to translate compounds like Indra-śatru as Bahuvrîhis or Tatpurushas, the Dictionary is surely bound to aid in clearing up his perplexity. Even as it is, many useful compounds have, I fear, been sacrificed to the exigencies of space. The meanings of these, however, can be easily inferred from the meaning of their component [illegible]. Take for example such a word as saṃyuktâkshara, a compound or conjunct letter.

Another distinctive peculiarity of this Dictionary consists in the articles on mythology, [illegible], religion and philosophy scattered everywhere throughout its pages. My own collections [illegible] various sources, especially those made during my three Indian journeys and published [illegible] named in the Preface to this volume (see p. xi, with note) have enabled me to [illegible] much useful information on many subjects not hitherto treated of in Sanskṛit Dictionaries [illegible]

[1] In this first case the hyphen used in the transliterated form is no doubt sufficient to distinguish the two forms from each other. Hence to economize space the figures have occasionally towards the end of the work been omitted (see sam-yâ and Sa-mâna, p. 1160).

[2] I must however here repeat the [illegible] of my original indebtedness to Westergaard's [illegible]. I omit to mention Whitney's [illegible] of [illegible] forms and [illegible]

Hence it must be understood that RV.[1] &c &c. denotes that a word occurs in the whole literature—both Vedic and Post-Vedic—beginning with the Rig-veda, while Mn &c signifies that the use of a word is restricted to the later literature beginning with Manu

And again, when a word had not yet been met with in any published literary work, but only in native lexicons, it was decided to denote this by the letter L

As to the words and meanings given on my authority and marked MW., many of them have been taken by me from commentaries or from the notes which I made after conversations with learned Pandits in their own country. For it seems to me that Sanskrit Dictionaries ought sometimes to give important modern words and meanings as used by modern educated Sanskrit scholars in India—such, for example, as the meaning of prâṇa-pratishṭhā[2] (see Additions under Prâṇa, p 1330)

Then a third improvement in the present edition, as every true scholar will admit, is the accentuation of words occurring in accentuated texts, although it will be found, I fear, that occasional accidental omissions occur, and in cross-references the accent has often been designedly dropped Many accents, too, which are only known from Pāṇini and the Phit-sūtras have been intentionally omitted

It is admitted that accentuation is marked only in the oldest Vedic texts, and that in later times it must have undergone great changes—so far at least as the spoken accent was concerned And this led me to decide that in preparing a practical Dictionary which employed so many complicated diacritical marks, it would be better not to increase the complication by adding the marks of accentuation All accentuation was, therefore, designedly omitted in the first edition But the careful study of Pāṇini's grammar, which my higher lectures, during the period of my active occupancy of the Boden Chair (1860–1888), obliged me to carry on, forced upon me the conviction that, inasmuch as at the time when the great Indian Grammarian—the chief authority for both Vedic and classical grammar—elaborated his wonderful system, every word in Sanskrit, as much in the ordinary language as in the Vedic, had its accent[3], a knowledge of accents must be often indispensable to a right knowledge of the meaning of words in Sanskrit

And in real truth the whole of Pāṇini's grammar is interpenetrated throughout by the ruling idea of the importance of accentuation to a correct knowledge of words and their meanings.

For example, we learn from Pān vi, 1, 201, that the word ksháya means 'abode,' but kshayá with the accent on the last syllable means 'destruction' And again, from Pān vi, 1, 205, that datta, 'given,' which as a p participle has the accent on the second syllable (dattá) is accentuated on the first syllable (i.e is pronounced dátta) when it is used as a proper name On the other hand, by Pān vi, 1, 206, dhṛíshṭa has the accent on the first syllable, whether as a participle, or as a name (not dhṛishṭá at p 519)

Further, by Pān vi, 1, 223 and vi, 2, 1 all compounds have different meanings according to the position of the accent. Hence Indra-śatru means either 'an enemy of Indra' or 'having Indra as an enemy,' according as the accent is on the last or first member of the compound (Indra-śatrú or Índra-śatru; see Additions, p 1321). These examples may suffice to show the importance of accentuation in affecting meanings

That this holds good in all languages is shown by the careful way in which accentuation is marked in modern English Dictionaries How, indeed, could it be otherwise when the transference of an accent from one syllable to another often makes such important alteration in the sense as may be noted in the words 'gállant' and 'gallánt,' 'récord' and 'recórd,' 'présent' and 'presént,' 'aúgust' and 'augúst,' 'désert' and 'desért' The bearing, too, of Sanskrit accentuation on comparative philology will be evident to any one who has noted the coincidences between the accentuation of Greek and Sanskrit words.

Manifestly then it would have been inexcusable had we omitted all accentuation in the present enlarged and improved work[4] It must be admitted, however, that incidence of accent has not been treated with exact uniformity in every page of this volume

In Pāṇini's system, as is well known, the position of the accent is generally denoted by some indicatory letter, attached to the technical names given by him to his affixes and suffixes, including the terminations

[1] Rig-Veda has now become an Anglicized word, and the dot under the R has been omitted in the Dictionary for simplicity

[2] I am sorry to have to confess that imbued as I once was with false notions as to the deadness of Sanskrit, I have sometimes omitted to give the meanings of important modern words like prâṇa-pratishṭhā in the body of the Dictionary

[3] The absence of accent was only permitted in calling out to a person in the distance, Pān. i, 2, 33

[4] The importance of correct accentuation and intonation in a language, the very sound of which is held by the Hindūs to be divine, and the bearing of Sanskrit accentuation on that of Greek, had become so impressed on me, that when I was sent as a Delegate to the Berlin International Congress of Orientalists by the Government of India in 1881, I requested Pandit Śyāmajī Krishna-varmā (who was also a Government Delegate) to illustrate my paper on Vedic hymns by repeating them with the right accentuation The Pandit's illustrations were not only much appreciated, but received with grateful acknowledgments at the time by the eminent Chairman, Prof A Weber, and other Sanskrit scholars present, but were misconstrued by one of my auditors—the well-known and most energetic Hon. Secretary of the Royal Asiatic Society. That gentleman made the Pandit's illustrative additions the subject of an extraordinary criticism in a paper on 'Oriental Congresses,' written by him and published in the Calcutta Review, No CLXI (1885), and quite recently reprinted A letter lately received by me from Professor A Weber, and printed last year in the Asiatic Quarterly Review, expresses the astonishment which we both felt at the statements in that paper.

of verbs and of verbal derivatives (called pratyaya) Thus by Pāṇ vi 1 163 the letter c added to a suffix (as in ghurac Pāṇ iii 2 161), indicates that the derivative bhangura formed by that suffix is accented on the last syllable (e g bhangurá)

In Vedic texts printed in Nāgarī character the accents are denoted by certain short lines placed above and below the letters but in the present Dictionary we have not thought it necessary to mark the accent of words printed in Nāgarī but only of their equivalents in Romanic and Italic type the common Udātta or acute accent being marked by and the rarer Svarita by

And in this connexion it should be mentioned that the employment of the long prosodial mark (¯) to denote long vowels (e g ā) has manifestly one advantage It enables the position of an accent to be indicated with greater clearness in cases where it falls on such vowels (e g ā́)

Next to the three principal improvements thus explained ought certainly to be reckoned the increased mechanical aids provided for the eye to facilitate the search for words in pages overcrowded with complicated and closely printed type And most conspicuous among these aids is the employment of thick Clarendon type (see p. xiv note 1) in place of the Italics of the previous edition both for the derivatives under roots and under leading words and for the compounds under such words thus allowing the Italic type to be reserved for compounds of compounds.

Then another improvement of the same kind has been effected by the distribution of the compounds belonging to leading words under two three or even more separate heads according to the euphonic changes in the finals of these words Thus in the first edition all the compounds belonging to the leading word Bahis were arranged under the one word Bahis (= Vahis) but in the present edition these compounds are far more readily found by their segregation under the five heads of Bahis Bahiḥ Bahir Bahiṣ and Bahiṣh (see pp 726 727)

Furthermore among useful changes must be reckoned the substitution of the short thick line (not necessarily expressive of a hyphen[1]) for the leading word in all groups of compounds whose first member is formed with that leading word. Take for example such an article as that which has the leading word Agni at pp 5 6 It is easy to see that the constant repetition of Agni in the compounds formed with that word was unnecessary Hence –kaṇa, –karman &c. are now substituted for Agni kaṇa Agni-karman &c. By referring to such an article as Mahā at pp 794-802 an idea may be formed of the space economized by this simple expedient.

And here I must admit that a few changes may possibly be held to be doubtful improvements, the real fact being that they have been forced upon us by the necessity for finding room for the 60 000 additional Sanskrit words with their meanings, the accession of which to the pages of the Dictionary—as already mentioned—became a paramount duty

For instance towards the end of the work the exigencies of space have compelled us to use Italics with hyphens not only in the case of sub-compounds (as, for example maṇi maya under candra-kānta at p 386 col 3 is for candrakānta-maṇi-maya) but also in the case of compounds falling under words combined with prepositions (as for example under such words as Vi buddha Vi bhaga, at p [illegible]

The same exigencies of space compelled us to group together all words compounded with [illegible] (see p. 949) and with 7 sa (see under sa-kaṅkaṭa p 1123 &c)

The same considerations too have obliged us to make a new departure in extending the use of the little circle to English words Its ordinary use of course is to denote that either the first or [illegible] part of a Sanskrit word has to be supplied. For instance such a word as keśa v coming after 1 Vapanīya at p 919 stands for keśa vapanīya while da data dar a after codati at p 400 are for cod[illegible] codarva and similarly dyotana under Pra-dyota at p 680 is for Pra-dyotana.

The application of this expedient to English words has enabled us to effect a great [illegible] be understood that this method of abbreviation is only applied to the leading mea[illegible] through a long article or to English words in close juxtaposition For example the lead[illegible] of ratha under the article 1 ratha (p 865) being chariot, this is shortened to ch in the [illegible] the article and clarified butter in one line is shortened to cl b in the next By [illegible] an article as sahasra at p 1195 it will be seen what a gain in space has thus been effected

In cases like – nsa under kalā (p 261) the denotes that –nsa is not a comple[illegible] prefixing of a which is not given because it has become blended with the final ā of the lea[illegible]

Much space too has been gained by the application of the symbols ^ ^ ^ ^ [illegible] Leumann's suggestion) to denote the blending of short and long vowels. Thus [illegible] of two short vowels (as of a+a into ā) ^ denotes the blending of a short with [illegible] a+a into ā) ^ denotes the blending of a long with a short (as of ā+a into ā) [illegible] of two long vowels (as of a+a into ā) and so with the other vowels, e g ê for a+[illegible] &c (see for example kritâgni for krita+agni kritôdaka for krita+udaka at p [illegible]

[1] Some compound words which are formed by Taddhita affixes supposed to be a[illegible] a hyphen [illegible]

There is also much still to be done in what may be called Epigraphic or Inscription literature, in which Dr. Fleet, Dr. E. Hultzsch, and Professor F. Kielhorn are labouring so effectively. And I am happy to say that we have occasionally availed ourselves of their labours in the following pages.

The Tantras, too, present a field of research almost wholly untrodden by European scholars, and these books at one time attracted much curiosity as likely to present a hopeful mine for exploitation. I therefore, during my Indian journeys, searched everywhere for good MSS. of the most popular Tantras, with a view to making the best procurable example of them better known in Europe by a good printed edition and translation. Everywhere I was told that the Rudra-yāmala Tantra was held in most esteem[1]. But after a careful examination of its contents I decided that it was neither worth editing nor translating (see my 'Brāhmanism and Hindūism,' pp. 205–208).

As to translations, the long array of 'Sacred Books of the East' might well be supposed to have exhausted the whole reservoir of Sanskrit works worthy of being translated, even admitting that the entire range of Sanskrit literature is held to be more or less sacred. Yet the series is still incomplete[2].

Assuming then my opinion on this point to be correct, I think I may fairly claim for the present Dictionary as great an amount of comprehensiveness as existing circumstances make either possible or desirable. Of course the earlier part of the work must perforce be less complete than the later. Nor can it be said to deal with every branch of literature with equal thoroughness, but its defects are, I hope, fairly remedied by the ample Additions at the end of the volume.

SECTION IV.

Reasons for applying the Roman Alphabet to the expression of Sanskrit, with an account of the Method of Transliteration employed in the Present Dictionary.

As I cherish the hope that this Dictionary may win its way to acceptance with the learned natives of India, I must ask European scholars to pardon my diffuseness if I state with some amplitude of detail my reasons for having applied the Roman or Latin alphabet to the expression of Sanskṛit more freely than any other Sanskrit lexicographer.

For indeed I know full well that all who belong to the straitest sect of Hindū scholars will at once flatly deny that their divine Sanskrit can with any propriety be exhibited to the eye clothed in any other alphabetical dress than their own 'divine Nāgarī.' Na hi pūtaṃ syād go-kshīraṃ śva-dṛitau dhṛitam, 'let not cow's milk be polluted by being put into a dog's skin.' How can it possibly be, they will exclaim, that the wonderful structure of our divine language and the subtle distinctions of its sacred sounds can be properly represented by such a thoroughly human and wholly un-Oriental graphic system as a modern European alphabet?

Let me, then, in the first place point out that our so-called European alphabet, as adopted by the Greeks, Romans, and modern nations of Europe, is really Asiatic, and not European in its origin. And secondly, let me try to show that it has certain features which connect it with the so-called divine Nāgarī alphabet of the Brāhmans. Nay more, that it is well suited to the expression of their venerated Sanskrit, while its numerous accessory appliances, its types of various kinds and sizes, its capital and small letters, hyphens, brackets, stops &c., make it better suited than any other graphic system to meet the linguistic requirements of the coming century—a century which will witness such vast physical, moral, and intellectual changes, that a new order of things, and almost a new world and a new race of beings, will come into existence. In that new world some of the most inveterate prejudices and peculiarities now separating nation from nation will be obliterated, and all nationalities—brought into fraternal relationship—will recognize their kinship and solidarity.

Even during the present century the great gulf dividing the West from the East has been partially bridged over. Steam and electricity have almost destroyed the meaning of differences of latitude and longitude, and nations which were once believed to be actually and figuratively the antipodes of each other have been brought to feel that mere considerations of distance are no obstacles to the reciprocal interchange of personal intercourse, and no bar to the adoption of all that is best in each other's customs and habits of thought.

And a still more remarkable event has happened. Europe has learnt to perceive that in imparting

[1] A version of it has been printed in Calcutta.

[2] This is not said in any carping spirit [illegible] the long line of 49 [illegible] translation of [illegible] Only about a third of 1017 hymns [illegible] version of all the hymns might have been given in one volume. It is regrettable, too, that vol. xlii only gives about a third of the Atharva-veda hymns, and that the Bhāgavata-purāṇa, which is a bible of modern Hindūism, has no place in the list, while some volumes are translations of far less important works, and some give re-translations of works previously translated by good scholars.

some of the benefits of her modern civilization to Eastern races she is only making a just return for the lessons imparted to her by Asiatic wisdom in past ages

For did she not receive her Bible and her religion from an Eastern people? Did not her system of counting by twelves and sixties come to her from Babylonia and her invaluable numerical symbols and decimal notation from India through the Arabs? Did not even her languages have their origin in a common Eastern parent? It cannot therefore be thought surprising if her method of expressing these languages by graphic symbols also came to her from an Eastern source

We cannot indeed, localize with absolute certainty the precise spot whence issued the springs of that grand flow of speech which spread in successive waves—commencing with the Sanskrit in Asia and the Keltic in Europe—over a large proportion of those two continents. Nor can we fix beyond all liability to question the local source of the first known purely phonographic alphabet But we stand on sure ground when we assert that such an alphabet is to be found inscribed on Phœnician monuments of a date quite as early as the cognate Moabite inscription on the stone of King Mesha known to belong to the middle of the ninth century B.C.[1]

It was of course a priori to be expected that Phœnicia—one of the chief centres of trade and the principal channel of communication between the Eastern and Western worlds in ancient times —should have been compelled to make use of graphic symbols of some kind to enable her to carry on her commercial dealings with other nations and it may fairly be conjectured that a mere system of ideograms would have been quite unsuited to her needs But this does not prove that the phonographic signs on Phœnician inscriptions were invented all at once without any link of connexion with previously current ideographic prototypes. And it is certainly noteworthy that the discovery at Tel el Amarna in Egypt of letters from an ancient king of Jerusalem written on tablets in the early Babylonian cuneiform script[2] proves that a Babylonian form of ideographic writing existed in Palestine and the neighbourhood of Phœnicia as early as the fifteenth century B.C.

Those, however who have conjectured that the Phœnician phonograms were developed out of the Babylonian cuneiform symbols, cannot be said to support their hypothesis by any satisfactory proof literary or epigraphic.

Nor does the theory which makes the South Semitic or Himyaritic scripts[3] the precursors and prototypes of the Phœnician seem to rest on sufficiently clear evidence

On the other hand it is certain that if we investigate the development of the Egyptian hieroglyphic ideograms we shall find that they passed into a so-called hieratic writing in which a certain number of phonograms were gradually introduced And it is highly probable that Phœnicia in her commercial intercourse with a country so close to her shores as Egypt, or perhaps through a colony actually established there became acquainted in very early times with this Egyptian hieratic script

Furthermore a careful comparison of the elaborate tables printed in the latest edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica and in the Oxford Helps to the Study of the Bible —giving the Egyptian and Phœnician symbols side by side—tends no doubt to show a certain resemblance of form between five or six of the Phœnician and corresponding Egyptian letters.

Nevertheless the comparison by no means makes it clear that all the Phœnician letters were derived from Egyptian models[4] nor does it invalidate the fact that existing epigraphic evidence is in favour of regarding Phœnicia as practically the inventor of that most important factor in the world's progress—a purely phonographic alphabet.

Here however I seem to hear some learned native of India remark —It may be true that the Phœnician inscriptions are prior in date to those hitherto discovered in India but do you really mean to imply that India's admirably perfect Deva nāgarī alphabet which we hold to be a divine gift[5] was borrowed from the imperfect alphabet of a nation of mere money making traders like the Phœnicians? Is it not the case that the earliest elements of civilization and enlightenment have always originated in the East and spread from the East to the West—not from the West to the East? And if as is generally admitted, the symbols for numbers which were as essential to the world's progress as letters originated in India and passed through

[1] The Phœnician inscriptions have been deciphered by assuming that the Phœnician language must have been akin to Hebrew Although their age cannot be ascertained with absolute certainty yet there is good reason to believe that some of them are of greater antiquity than the cognate Moabite inscription of King Mesha which was found at Dibon a little N E. of Jerusalem and south of Heshbon.

[2] Some of these tablets show that diplomatic correspondence passed between Babylonia and Egypt through Palestine In fact, Babylonian was in those days the language of diplomacy as French once was in Europe Other tablets in Babylonian cuneiform character have proved to be letters written by the king of Jerusalem to the Egyptian monarch to whose suzerainty he appears to have been subject.

[3] There are two kinds of Himyaritic inscriptions, viz. Sabæan and Minæan.

[4] Notwithstanding the elaborate proofs given by the Abbé Van Drival in his ingenious and interesting treatise on l'origine de l'écriture

[5] See note 2 p. xxi.

Semitic countries into Europe, why should not alphabets have had the same origin and the same course? Did not the Hindūs invent for themselves their own grammar, their own science of language, their own systems of philosophy, logic, algebra, and music? Have they not an immense literature on these and other subjects, much of which must have been written down at least 600 years B.C.? And are there not references in this literature to the existence of writing in India in very ancient times? for instance, in the Vāsishtha Dharma-sūtra of the later Vedic period, in the Laws of Manu[1], in Pāṇini, who lived about 400 B.C.[2], in the Pāli Canon of the Buddhists which refers to writing schools and writing materials[3]. And again, do not the actual inscriptions of King Asoka of the third century B.C. exhibit a remarkably perfect system of alphabetical signs, and many varying forms in different districts of India, postulating several centuries of antecedent development[4]? And if no Indian epigraphs of an earlier date than the reign of Asoka have yet been discovered, is not that due to the circumstance that the art of incising letters on stone and metal only came into use when great Hindū kings arose, whose empire was sufficiently extensive to make it necessary to issue edicts and grants to their subjects? Bearing all this in mind, may it not be contended that if there has been any plagiarism in the matter of alphabets, the borrowing may have been from the Hindūs rather than by them?

Such questions as these have often been addressed to me by learned Pandits, and it must be confessed that they are by no means to be brushed aside as unworthy of consideration. Quite the reverse. They contain many statements to which no exception can be taken. But my present object is not to furnish incontestable proof of the derivation of Indian alphabets from a Phœnician source. It is rather to point out to Indian scholars that even admitting (with some eminent authorities) that there is good ground for claiming an indigenous origin for Hindū alphabets, many of the letters composing them offer points of contact and affinity with those of Phœnicia, and therefore with those of Greece and Rome and modern Europe.

And at the outset it must be frankly acknowledged that the first phonographic alphabet brought to light on ancient Phœnician monuments constituted by no means a perfect alphabetic system. It had, no doubt, advanced beyond the ideographic stage, and even to some extent beyond the syllabic, but its phonograms were only twenty-two in number, and mainly represented consonants. It had not attained to the level of an alphabet in which vowel symbols are promoted to an equality of representation with consonantal, and treated as compeers, not as mere secondary appendages. And even to this day, the Semitic alphabets connected with the Phœnician—viz. the Hebrew, Aramæan, and Arabian—are nearly as imperfect, and very little better than, so to speak, consonantal skeletons, wanting the life-blood which vowels only can impart.

Indeed, the imperfection of the Phœnician script is well shown by the fact that the Greeks who, as every one admits, were indebted to the Phœnicians for their rudimentary consonantal method of writing, had no sooner received it (probably quite as early as 800 B.C.) than they began to remedy its defects, and gradually developed out of it a true alphabetic method of their own, which was ultimately made to flow from left to right in opposition to the Semitic method.

Similarly, too, the Romans when they had accepted the Phœnician graphic signs from the Greeks, found it necessary to improve upon them, and ultimately developed out of them an even more practical alphabetic system.

But surely these two facts may be appealed to as making it not improbable that if the Greeks and Romans, two highly intellectual races, sprung from the same Āryan stock as the Brāhmans, condescended to accept certain rudimentary phonograms from the Phœnicians, and to expand them into alphabets suited to the expression of their own languages, the Brāhmans also might have deigned, if not to accept a foreign alphabet, at least to improve their own graphic system by modifications introduced through contact with Semitic races.

Nor should it be forgotten that in later times the Hindūs did actually borrow a Semitic alphabet from Arabia for the expression of their vernacular Hindī[5].

No doubt it must be admitted that, had any overmastering conviction of the necessity for the general use of written signs taken hold of the Hindū mind in early times, India would not have consented to be beholden to other countries for even improvements in her own forms of writing.

But the most patriotic of India's patriots must acknowledge that the Hindūs have always preferred oral to written communications. Indeed, although a vast literature exists in Sanskrit, no word exists exactly corresponding to our English word 'literature[6],' and even if such a word were available, true

[1] In Book viii, 168 written legal documents are mentioned.

[2] He gives the words lipi and libi in one of his rules (iii, 2, 21).

[3] The bark of the Bhoj (or Birch) tree and the leaf of the palm seem to have constituted the chief material used by the Hindūs till the introduction of paper by the Muhammadans. No such durable materials as Egyptian papyrus or European parchment—the latter being prohibited on account of its impurity—seem to have been employed.

[4] See note 3, p. xxv.

[5] Hindī when so transliterated is called Hindūstānī or Urdū.

[6] Litera, 'a letter,' is derived from lino, 'to smear,' just as Sanskrit lipi from lip. If a corresponding word were to be used in Sanskrit it would be lipi-śāstra. The word akshara, which is the Sanskrit for a letter, properly means 'indelible,' and this meaning seems to point to the use of letters in early times for inscriptions on stones and metal. Similarly the first meaning of lekha is 'scratching with a sharp point.'

Indian Pandits would prefer to designate the immense series of their sacred books by such words as Veda or Vidyā (from vid to know') Śruti (from śru to hear) Śastra (from śās to teach) Smṛiti (from smṛi to remember) the reason being that like Papia Bishop of Hierapolis (whose date according to Dean Farrar is 140 A D) they consider that the things from books are not so advantageous as things from the living and abiding voice Nor must we forget that the climate of India wa unfavourable to the preservation of such writing material as existed in ancient times

And besides this may it not be conjectured that the invention and general diffusion of alphabetic writing was to Indian learned men gifted with prodigious powers of memory and equipped with laboriously acquired stores of knowledge very much what the invention and general use of machinery was to European handicraft men? It seemed to deprive them of the advantage and privilege of exercising their craft It had to be acquiesced in and was no doubt prevalent for centuries before the Christian era but it was not really much encouraged And even to this day in India the man whose learning is treasured up in his own memory is more honoured than the man of far larger acquirements whose knowledge is either wholly or partially derived from books and dependent on their aid for its communication to others[1]

It seems, therefore not unreasonable to assume that when the idea of the nece sity for inventing alphabetic si ns began to impress itself on the minds of Semitic races it had not taken such deep root among the inhabitants of India as to lead to the invention or general adoption of any one fixed system of wri ing of their own It eem indeed more probable that learned men in that country viewed the art of writing too apathetically to make a stand against the introduction of alphabetical ideas from forei n sources.

At all events there can be no antecedent improbability in the theory propound d by German Sanskritists that an early passage of phonographic symbols took place from a Phœnician centre eastward towards Mesopotamia and India at about the same period as their passage westward towards Europe namely about 800 B.C

It is not asserted that the exact channel by which they were transmitted has been satisfactorily demonstrated. Some think—and as it seems to me with much plau ibility—that they may have been introduced through contact with the Greeks[2] Perhaps a more likely conjecture is that Hindu traders pas ing up the Persian Gulf had commercial dealings with Aramæan traders in Mesopotamia and becoming acquainted with their graphic methods imported the knowledge and u e of some of their phonetic signs into India.

This view was first propounded in the writings of the learned Professor A Weber of Berlin and has recently been ably argued in a work on Indische Palæographie by the late Professor Bühler of Vienna (publi hed in 1896) If Indian Pandits will consult that most interesting standard work they will there find a table exhibiting the most ancient of known Phœnician letters side by side with th kindred symbols used in the Moabite inscriptions of King Me ha—which as before intimated is known to be as old as about 850 B C—while in parallel column and in a series of other excellent tables are given the corresponding phonographic symbols from the numerous inscriptions of King A oka scattered everywhere throughout Central and Northern India[3]

These inscription alphabets are of two principal kinds —

The first kind is now called Kharoshṭhī (or Ass s lip form of writing lipi being under tood) This belongs to the North west corner of the Panjab and Eastern Afghānistān It was used by King A oka for a few of his rock and stone inscriptions and is a kind of writing the prototype of which was probably introduced into Persia about 500 B C and brought by Persian rulers into Northern India in the fourth century B C. At all events, it is well known that the Persian monarchs of the Akhæmenian period employed Aramæan scribes, and that the Kharoshṭhī writing, even if originally Indian (according to Sir A. Cunningham and others), has assumed under their hands a manifestly Aramaic character, flowing like all Semitic writing from right to left. Possibly, however, as it seems to me, Grecian influences (which penetrated into India before the time of Alexander) may have partially operated in assimilating this early North-western Indian script to a Phœnician type It may be excluded from our present inquiry, because it never became generally current in India, and never developed into a form suitable for printing

The second kind of ancient Indian script is called Brāhma (or Brāhmī lipi). This is without doubt the oldest of the two principal forms[1] Its claim to greater antiquity is proved by its name Brāhma—given to it by the Brāhmans, because, as they assert, it was invented by their god Brahmā[2]—an assertion which may be taken as indicating that, whatever its origin, it was moulded into its present form by the Brāhmans

And undeniably it is this Brāhma writing (Brāhmī lipi) which has the best right to be called the true Indian Brahmanical script It must have been the first kind of writing used when Sanskrit literature began to be written down (perhaps six centuries B C), and it is the script of the Asoka inscriptions of Central and Northern India—and even of North-western India, where it is found concurrently with the Kharoshthī. It was employed to express the Prākrit dialect[3] of the Buddhist kings, and flowed, like its later development called Nāgarī, from left to right Its first appearance on actually existing inscriptions—so far as at present discovered—cannot be placed earlier than the date of these kings in the third century B C

But it is important to note that the existence of the Brāhmī lipi in India must be put back to a period sufficiently early to allow for its having once flowed from right to left like the Kharoshthī, probably as early as the sixth century B C This is made clear by the direction of the letters on an ancient coin discovered by Sir A Cunningham at Eran[4]—a place in the central provinces remarkable for its monumental remains One can scarcely accept seriously the suggestion that the position of the short ि i in the present Nāgarī is a survival of the original direction of the writing[5].

If then any unprejudiced Hindū scholar will examine attentively the tables in Professor Bühler's book, he will, I think, be constrained to admit that the Indian Brāhma letters have certain features which connect them with the ancient Phœnician script, and therefore with the Greek and Roman.

It should not, however, be forgotten that an interval of nearly seven centuries separates the Phœnician from the Brāhma inscription-letters, and that to make the affinity between the two alphabets clearer the side-lights afforded by collateral and intermediate Semitic scripts ought to be taken into account[6] Nor should it be forgotten that when the Hindūs, like the Greeks, changed the direction of their writing, some of the symbols were turned round or their forms inverted, or closed up or opened out in various ways.

The further development of the Brāhma symbols into the modern Deva-nāgarī and its co-ordinate scripts[7] is easily traceable It must, however, be borne in mind that the later Pandits tried to improve the ancient graphic signs by setting them up as upright as possible and by drawing a horizontal stroke to serve as a line from which the letters might hang down, and so secure a system of straight writing—often conspicuously absent in Hindūstānī and Persian caligraphy[8]

I here append a table consisting of seven columns, in which I have so arranged the letters as to illustrate the view that the Phœnician alphabet spread about 800 B C first westward towards Greece and Italy, and secondly eastward towards India

The column marked 1 gives ten Phœnician letters That marked 2, to the left of 1, gives the ten corresponding Greek letters, that marked 3 the corresponding Roman; and that marked 4 the corresponding English letters Then the column marked 2, to the right of 1, gives the ten corresponding Brāhma letters; that marked 3 shows the gradual developments of the Brāhma symbols as exhibited on various inscriptions, and that marked 4 gives the corresponding letters in modern Nāgarī[9]

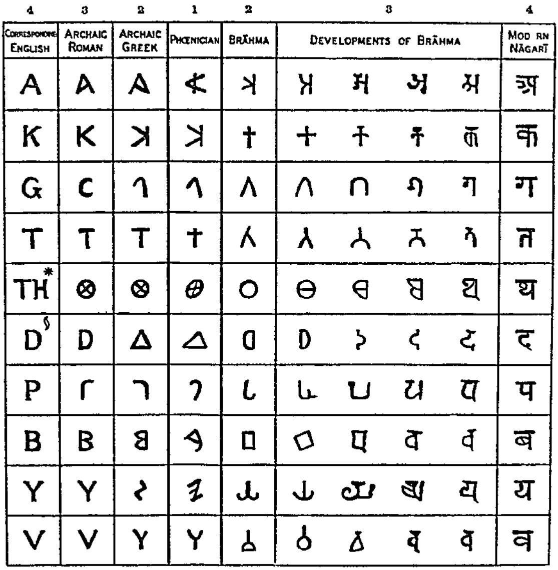
[1] A variation of it called Bhaṭṭiprolu is described by Buhler

[2] In the same way the great Arabian Teacher Muhammad declared in the first Sura of the Kurān (according to Rodwell, p 2, and Sale, p 450 with note) that 'God taught the use of the pen.' Even some Christians may not be indisposed to agree with Hindūs and Muhammadans in holding that the faculty of writing, as an instrument for the expression of thought—although dormant through all the early ages of the world's history—is as much a divine gift as language. Muhammad's view, however, of the divine origin of writing consisted in declaring that the Kurān descended ready written from heaven

[3] For the language of the inscriptions, see p xxv, note 3

[4] These letters are shown in Professor Buhler's tables.

[5] Our invaluable decimal notation certainly came from India, and may be said to conform to Semitic methods in the direction of the notation, inasmuch as units are placed on the right, while tens and hundreds are on the left



[6] Professor Buhler's first table in his work on Indian Palæography would have been more convincing had he given examples of collateral and intermediate Semitic forms.

[7] Such as the Bengālī, the Marāṭhī, Gujarātī &c, some of which may be usefully studied as presenting forms more closely resembling the ancient Brāhma letters

[8] A similar line is often drawn in English copybooks and on writing paper as an aid to straight writing, but always below, not above the letters.

[9] Dr. Lüders, of the Indian Institute, has kindly assisted me in the right formation of some of the inscription letters. The roughness of some is due to their being photographs from original impressions

Let any one study this Table and he must, I think admit that it indicates an original connexion or family likeness between the Phœnician and earlie t Indian or Brahma letters, whilst it also illu trates the fact that the plastic hand of the Brāhmans has greatly modified and expanded the original germs without however obliterating the evident indications of their connexion with the Phœnician

* This is for th Greek theta which is represented in this Dictionary according to present usage by th althou h ṭ or ṯ would be a more sc entific symbol

§ According to Professor Buhler the Brāhma ᗡ became Nāgarī ध dh from which द d was evolved

And indeed the mod st equipment of twenty-two letters which satisfied the Phœnicians, Greeks and Romans to whom the invention of writing was a mere human contrivance for the attainment of purely human ends could not possibly have satisfied the devout Hindū who regarded his language as of divine origin, and therefore not to be expressed by anything short of a perfect system of equally divine symbols. Even the popular Prākṛit of King Asoka s edicts seems to have required nearly forty symbols[1] and the amount needed for the full Brāhmī lipi, as used for the Sanskrit of that period, could not have been less than fifty (if the symbols for ai, au, ri, rī, lri, lrī, and la be included).

[1] Some of the inscriptions had not the f ll complement of vowel signs. As a m tter of fact I find that in some inscriptions a list of only thirty fi e letters in all is given while in oth rs there are thirty-six, and in others again thirty nin Professor Buhler says (p. 82 of his latest work pub ished in 1898) that the ordinary Brāhma alphabet has forty four letters traceabl in the oldest inscriptions (includi g the Bhaṭṭiprolu) which with au (deri ed from o) would mak forty-five, and with the mark for Visarga which first occurs in the Kush na inscriptions fort -six. The common reckonin for the vow ls as taught in indigenous schools, makes them only twelve.

Then, if we turn to the Brāhma alphabet in its final development, called Nāgarī, we see at a glance that it is based on the scientific phonetic principle of 'one sound one symbol'—that is, every consonantal sound is represented by one invariable symbol, and every shade of vowel-sound—short, long, or prolated—has one unvarying sign (not as in English where the sound of e in be may be represented in sixteen different ways). Hence, for the expression of the perfectly constructed Sanskrit language there are sixteen vowel-signs (including am and aḥ and excluding the prolated vowel forms), and thirty-five simple consonants, as exhibited on p. xxxvi of this volume.

Of course a system of writing so highly elaborated was only perfected by degrees[1], and no doubt it is admirably adapted to the purposes it is intended to serve. Yet it is remarkable that even in its latest development, as employed in the present Dictionary, it has characteristics indicative of its probable original connexion with Semitic methods of writing, which from their exclusively consonantal character are admittedly imperfect.

For the Pandits, unlike the Greeks and Romans, cannot in my opinion be said to have adopted to the full the true alphabetic theory which assigns a separate independent position to all vowel-signs. And my reason for so thinking is that they make the commonest of all their vowels—namely short a[2]—inherent in every isolated consonant, and give a subordinate position above or below consonants to some of their vowel-signs. And this partially syllabic character of their consonantal symbols has compelled them to construct an immense series of intricate conjunct consonants, some of them very complicated, the necessity for which may be exemplified by supposing that the letters of the English word 'strength' were Nāgarī letters, and written सतरेनगथ. This would have to be pronounced satarenagatha, unless a conjunction of consonantal signs were employed, to express str and ngth, and unless the mark called Virāma, 'stop,' were added to the last consonant. So that with only thirty-three simple consonants and an almost indefinite number of complex conjunct consonants the number of distinct types necessary to equip a perfect Sanskrit fount for printing purposes amounts to more than 500.

Surely, then, no one will maintain that, in these days of every kind of appliance for increased facilities of inter-communication, any language is justified in shutting itself up behind such a complex array of graphic signs, however admirable when once acquired. At all events such a system ought not to have the monopoly for the expression of a language belonging to the same family as our own and in a country forming an integral part of the British Empire. The Sanskrit language, indeed, is a master-key to a knowledge of all the Hindū vernaculars, and should moreover be studied as a kind of linguistic bond of sympathy and fellow-feeling between the inhabitants of the United Kingdom and their Indian fellow-subjects. But to this end every facility ought to be afforded for its acquirement.

And if, as we have tried to show, the Brāhmī lipi, the Nāgarī, and the Greek and Romanic alphabets are all four related to each other—at least, in so far as they are either derived from or connected with the same rudimentary stock—it surely cannot be opposed to the fitness of things, that both the Nāgarī and Romanic alphabets should be equally applied to the expression of Sanskrit, and both of them made to co-operate in facilitating its acquisition.

Nor let it be forgotten that in the present day the use of the English language is spreading everywhere throughout India, and that it already co-exists with Sanskrit as a kind of lingua franca or medium of communication among educated persons, just as Latin once co-existed with Greek. So much so indeed, that, contemporaneously with the diffusion of the English language, the Roman graphic system, adopted by all the English-speaking inhabitants of the British Empire, has already forced itself on the acceptance of the Pandits whether they like it or not, as one vehicle for the expression of their languages, just as centuries ago the Arabic and Persian written characters were forced upon them by their Muhammadan conquerors for the expression of Hindī.

It is on this account that I feel justified in designating the European method of transliteration employed in this Dictionary by the term 'Indo-Romanic alphabet.'

And be it understood that such an acceptance of the Romanic alphabet involves no unscientific

[1] The oldest known inscription in Sanskrit is on a rock at Junā-garh in Kāthiāwār. It is called the Rudra-dāman inscription, and dates from the second century A.D. It is not in Nāgarī, but in old inscription letters. The Bower MS. of about 400 A.D. shows a great advance towards the Nāgarī, while Danti-durga's inscription of about 750 A.D. exhibits a complete set of symbols very similar to the Nāgarī now in use. It is noteworthy, however, that the first manuscript in really modern Nāgarī is not older than the eleventh century A.D.

[2] This a is the a of our words 'vocal organ' (pronounced vocul orgun). Sanskrit does not possess the sound of a in our 'man,' nor that of o in our 'on.' As a consonant cannot be pronounced without a vowel, the Brāhmans chose the commonest of their vowels for the important duty of enabling every consonant to be pronounced. Hence every consonant is named by pronouncing it with a (e.g. ka, kha, ga &c.). It is, I suppose, for a similar reason that we have used the common vowel symbol e for naming many of our English letters.

adaptation of it to the expression of Sanskrit like our chaotic adaptation of it to the expression of English or like the inaccurate use of it by native writers themselves in transliterating their own Indian words[1] Quite the reverse The Roman alphabet adapts itself so readily to expansion by the employment of diacritical points and marks that it may be regarded as a thoroughly scientific instrument for the accurate expression of every Indian sound and probably of nearly every sound in every language of the world. And it may I think be confidently predicted that before the twentieth century has closed man's vision overtasked by a constantly increasing output of literary matter will peremptorily demand that the reading of the world's best books be facilitated by the adoption of that graphic system which is most universally applicable and most easily apprehensible Whether however the Roman symbols will be ultimately chosen in preference to other competing systems as the best basis for the construction of a world's future universal alphabet no one can of course foretell with the same confidence

One thing I contend, is certain. Any ordinary scholar who consults the present work will be ready to admit that it derives much of its typographical clearness from certain apparently trifling but really important contrivances, possible in Romanic type impossible in Nagari One of these of course is the power of leaving spaces between the words of the Sanskrit example Surely such a sentence as sādhu mitrāṇy akuśalād vārayanti is clearer than sādhumitrāṇyakuśalādvārayanti Again who will deny the gain in clearness resulting from the ability to make a distinction between such words as smith and Smith brown and 'Brown bath and Bath' not to speak of the power of using italics and other forms of European type And without doubt the use of the hyphen for separating long compounds in a language where compounds prevail more than simple words[2] will be appreciated by all I can only say that without that most useful little mark the present volume must have lost much in clearness, and still more in compactness for besides the obvious advantage of being able to indicate the difference between such compounds as su-tapa and suta-pa which would have been impossible in Nagarī type it is manifest that even the simplest compounds like sad-asad viveka sv-alpa-kesin would have required, without its use an extra line to explain their analysis[3]

Fairness however demands that a few of the obvious defects of the Indo-Romanic system of transliteration adopted in this volume should be acknowledged. In certain cases it confessedly offend against scientific exactness nor does it always consistently observe the rule that every simple vowel sound should be represented by a single symbol For instance the Sanskrit vowels ऋ and ॠ are not represented in this Dictionary by the symbols ṛ and ṝ according to the practice of some German scholars—a practice adopted by the Geneva Transliteration Committee—but by ṛi and ṝī And my reason is that, inasmuch as in English Grammar r is not regarded as a semi vowel, ṛ and ṝ are unsuitable representatives of vowel-sounds. Moreover they are open to this objection that when the dot under the ṛ is accidentally dropped or broken off as often happens in printing especially in India the result is worse than if the r were followed by i For example Krshna is surely worse than Krishna

So again in the case of aspirated consonants, the aspiration ought not to be represented by a second letter attached to them Indeed in the case of ch employed by Sir W Jones for the palatal च and chh for छ the inconvenience has been so great that in the present edition I have adopted (in common with many other Sanskritists) the simple c for च the pronunciation being the same as c in the Italian dolce or as ch in church the latter of which would if a Sanskrit word be written curc. Similarly ch has been adopted for छ[4]

As to the transliteration of the palatal sibilant श I have preferred ś to the ś employed in the first edition, and I much prefer it to the German and French method of using ç Experience proves that the cedilla is often either broken off in printing or carelessly dropped and as a consequence important words such as Asoka are now often wrongly printed and pronounced Acoka.

So also I should have preferred the symbol ṣ for the cerebral sibilant but have felt it desirable to retain sh in the present edition There is the same objection to ṣ as to the ṛ mentioned above. This

[1] Take for example the following transliterated words in a recent pamphlet by a native —Devi pura Durga Purana a klam Krshna Smriti A oka Crva &c. I have even seen crab written for the Hindustānī kharāb bad.

[2] Forster gives an example of one compound word consisting of 15 syllables This might be matched by even longer specimens from what is called Campu composition.

We may at least entertain the hope that the hyphen will not be denied to Sanskrit for the better understanding of the more complex words, such for example as ta amanvitaḥ pra- nritavat karma, ka arapalarvadhiri— rma taiśha-rand trena taken at haphazard from Dr Muir's Texts. We may even express a hope that German scholars and other Europeans who speak forms of Aryan speech all of them equally delighting in composition, may more frequently condescend to employ the hyphen for some of their own Sesquipedalia Verba, thereby imitating the practical Englishman in his Parliamentary compounds, such for example as I a-vas-corf s ... -t-sen- t nuan Ireland-t-L.

[3] In the paper on transliteration which I read at the Berlin International Congress, I proposed a kind of mark of accentuation to represent aspirated consonants, as, for example, k' p' To say (as at p. xvi) that aspirated k or p is like kh in inkhorn or ph in uphill is to a certain extent misleading It is simply k or p pronounced as in Ireland with a forcible emission of the breath will be clear if we write the important word Ṛishi in the way German scholars write it, namely Ṛṣi, and then omit the dots thus, Ṛsi.

In regard to the nasals I have in the present edition adopted ṅ for ङ and ñ for ञ. In these changes I am glad to find myself in accord with the Geneva Transliteration Committee.

As to the method of using italic k, kh for च, छ and italic g, gh for ज, झ—adopted in the 'Sacred Books of the East'—the philological advantage thought to be gained by thus exhibiting the phonetic truth of the interchange of gutturals and palatals, appears to me to be completely outweighed by the disadvantage of representing by similar symbols sounds differing so greatly in actual pronunciation. For instance, to represent such common words as 'chinna' by '*kh*inna' and 'jaina' by '*g*aina' seems to me as objectionable as to write '*Kh*ina' for 'China' and '*G*apan' for 'Japan' The plan of using Italics is no safeguard, seeing that in printing popular books and papers the practice of mixing up Roman and Italic letters in the same word is never adhered to, so that it is now common to find the important Indian sect of Jains printed and pronounced 'Gains[1].'

Having felt obliged by the form in which this Dictionary is printed to dwell at full length on a matter of the utmost importance both in its bearing on the more general cultivation of Sanskrit and on the diffusion of knowledge in our Eastern Empire, I must now repeat my sense of the great assistance the cause of the transliteration of Indian languages into Romanized letters formerly received at the hands of the late Sir Charles Trevelyan He was the first (in his able minute, dated Calcutta, January, 1834[2]) to clear away the confusion of ideas with which the subject was perplexed He also was the first to awaken an interest in the question throughout England about forty-two years ago His arguments induced me to take part in the movement, and our letters on the subject were published by the 'Times,' and supported by its advocacy Since then, many Oriental books printed on a plan substantially agreeing with Sir W. Jones' Indo-Romanic system, have been published[3]. Moreover, on more than one occasion I directed the attention of the Royal Asiatic Society[4], and of the Church Missionary Society[5], and Bible Society, to this important subject, and at the Congress of Orientalists held at Berlin in September, 1881, I read a paper, and submitted a proposal for concerted international action with a view to the fixing of a common scheme of transliteration. The discussion that followed led to the appointment of the first Commission for settling a common international system of transcription, and it may, I think, be fairly assumed that the agitation thus set in motion, and carried on for so many years, was one of the principal factors in bringing about the proposed international scheme issued by the Transliteration Committee of the Geneva Oriental Congress in September, 1894

SECTION V

Acknowledgment of Assistance Received.

In the Preface to the first edition I made special mention of the name of an eminent scholar who was a member of the Oxford University Press Delegacy when the publication of that edition was undertaken—Dr. Robert Scott, sometime Master of Balliol, afterwards Dean of Rochester and co-author with Dr Liddell of the well-known Greek Lexicon He had been one of my kindest friends, and wisest counsellors, ever since the day I went to him for advice during my first undergraduate days at Balliol, on my receiving an appointment in the Indian Civil Service, and I need scarcely repeat my sense of what this Dictionary, in its inception, owed to his support and encouragement

Nor need I repeat the expression of my sense of obligation to my predecessor in the Boden Chair, Professor H H Wilson, who first led me to the study of Sanskrit about sixty years ago (in 1839), and furnished me with my first materials for an entirely new system of Sanskrit lexicography (see p xi) All the words and meanings marked W. in the following pages in the present work rest on his authority.

[1] Surely we ought to think of our Indian fellow-subjects who in their eagerness to learn the correct pronunciation of English would be greatly confused if told that such good old English words as pink, catch, chink, gimp, jet, ought to be written pink, kak, khink, gimp, get.

[2] This will be found at p. 3 of the 'Original Papers illustrating the History of the Application of the Roman Alphabet to the Languages of India,' edited by me in 1859.

[3] Among other numberless publications a most accurate edition of the Rig-veda itself, edited by Professor Aufrecht, was printed in the Roman character, and published in two of the volumes of Professor Weber's Indische Studien.

[4] See especially my paper read before the R A.S., April 21, 1890

[5] In 1858 I wrote strong letters to the Rev Henry Venn, deprecating the system of transliteration then adopted by the C.M S It has been recently remodelled on the lines of the Geneva Congress report

Nevertheless sincerity obliges me to confess that, during my long literary career my mind has had to pass through a kind of painful discipline involving a gradual weakening of faith in the trustworthiness of my fellow men not excepting that of my first venerated teacher I began my studies, indeed, with much confidence in the thought that one man existed on whom I could lean as an almost infallible guide but as I grew a little wiser and my sensitiveness to error sharpened, I discovered to my surprise that I was compelled to reject much of his teaching as doubtful. Nay I am constrained to confess that as I advanced further on the path of knowledge my trustfulness in others besides my old master experienced by degrees a series of disagreeable and unexpected shocks till now that I have arrived at nearly the end of my journey I find myself left with my faith in the accuracy of human beings generally—and certainly not excepting myself—somewhat distressingly disturbed Such painful feelings result, I fear in my own case from a gradual and inevitable growth of the critical faculty during a long lifetime and are quite consistent with a sense of gratitude for the effective aid received from my collaborators without which indeed, I could not have brought this work to a conclusion.

In my original Preface I expressed my thanks to each and all of the scholars who aided me in the compilation of the first edition and whose names in the chronological order of their services were as follow —

The late Rev J Wenger of the Baptist Mission Calcutta Dr Franz Kielhorn afterwards Superintendent of Sanskrit Studies in Deccan College Poona, and now Professor of Sanskrit in the University of Göttingen Dr Hermann Brunnhofer Mr A. E. Gough, M A., of Lincoln College Oxford, sometime Professor in the Government Colleges of Benares, Allāhābād, and Calcutta and lastly Mr E. L. Hogarth, M A., of Brasenose College sometime Head Master of the Government Provincial School at Calicut.

It is now my duty to express my grateful obligations to the able and painstaking Assistants who have co-operated with me in producing the present greatly enlarged and improved work

No one but those who have taken part in similar labours can at all realize the amount of tedious toil—I might almost say dreary drudgery—involved in the daily routine of small lexicographical details, such as verifying references and meanings making indices and lists of words, sorting and sifting an ever increasing store of materials, revising old work arranging and re-arranging new writing and re-writing and interlineating copy correcting and re-correcting proofs—printed be it remembered in five kinds of intricate type bristling with countless accents and diacritical points, and putting the eyesight, patience and temper of author collaborators, compositors, and press-readers to severe trial. I mention these matters not to magnify my own labours, but to show that I could not have prosecuted them without the able co-operation of others.

The names of my new Assistants in chronological order are as follow —

First, Dr Ernst Leumann (a native of Switzerland) who worked with me in Oxford from October 3 1882 until April 15, 1884 when he accepted a teachership in the Kantonschule of Frauenfeld in Switzerland. I have already acknowledged my obligations to him.

He was succeeded by the late Dr Schönberg (a pupil of the late Professor Bühler) who came to me in a condition of great physical weakness and whose assistance only extended from May 20, 1884 to July 10 1885 when he left me to die. He was a good scholar and a good worker but impatient of supervision and despite my vigilance I found it impossible to guard against a few errors of omission and commission due to the rapid impairment of his powers

Then followed an interval during which my sources of aid were too fitful to be recorded.

In September 1886 Dr Leumann who had meanwhile been appointed Professor of Sanskrit in the University of Strassburg renewed his co-operation but only in an intermittent manner and while still resident in Germany Unhappily the pressure of other duties obliged him in September 1890 to withdraw from all work outside that of his Professorship. He laboured with me in a scholarly way as far as p 474 but his collaboration did not extend beyond 355 pages, because he took no part in pp. 13–256 which represent the period of Dr Schönberg's collaboration.

It was not till December 1890 that Dr Carl Cappeller Professor of Sanskrit in the University of Jena, began his painstaking co-operation, which, starting from the word Dāda (p 474) he has prosecuted perseveringly to the completion of the Dictionary And it should be put on record that, although his collaboration had to be carried on contemporaneously with the discharge of his duties at Jena—involving the necessity for a constant interchange of communications by post—yet it resulted in the production of 834 finished pages between March, 1891 and July 1898 It should also be recorded that, from the beginning of the letter प p he had a careful assistant in Dr Blau of Berlin who also occasionally read the proof-sheets and contributed a certain number of words for the Addenda.

Furthermore I must express my gratitude to Herr Geheimrath Franz Kielhorn, C. I. E., Ph.D., Professor of Sanskrit in the University of Göttingen who was my assistant soon after the inception of the first edition for his free and generous supervision of the grammatical portions of the present edition from about the year 1886 and his readiness to place at my disposal the experience which he gained during his labours for many years as Superintendent of Sanskrit Studies at the Government College Poona

I have finally to record my grateful appreciation of the value of the principal works used or consulted by my collaborators and myself in compiling this Dictionary. Some of these, and a few important grammatical works—such as the Mahā-bhāshya (in the excellent edition of Professor Kielhorn), the Siddhānta-kaumudī &c—besides many other texts, such as that of Manu, the Brihat-saṃhitā &c, did not exist in good critical editions when the great Thesaurus of the two German Lexicographers was being compiled

Professor Ernst Leumann informs me that during the period of his collaboration he was much aided by Grassmann's Rig-veda, Whitney's Index Verborum to the published text of the Atharva-veda; Stenzler's Indices to the Grihya-sūtras of Āśvalāyana, of Pāraskara, Sānkhāyana, Gobhila, and the Dharma-śāstra of Gautama, the vocabularies to Aufrecht's edition of the Aitareya Brāhmana; Bühler's Āpastamba Dharma-sūtra; Garbe's Vaitāna-sūtra; Hillebrandt's Śānkhāyana Srauta-sutra &c He states that in his portion of the work his aim was rather to verify and revise the words and meanings given in the Petersburg Dictionaries than to add new and unverifiable matter In regard to quotations he refers the reader to the Journal of the German Oriental Society, vol xlii, pp 161–198

Professor C Cappeller states that in addition to the books enumerated above he wishes to name in the first place Böhtlingk's Upanishads, his Pānini (2nd ed) and Kāvyâdarsa as well as the valuable critical remarks of that honoured Nestor of Sanskritists on numerous texts, published in various journals; further the Jaiminīya Upanishad Brāhmana edited by H Oertel and various Sūtra works with their indices by F. Knauer, M Winternitz, J Kirste, and W. Caland For some additions contributed from the Drāhyāyana Srauta-sūtra he is indebted to Dr J N Reuter of Helsingfors. He also made use of the Vaijayantī of Yādava-prakāśa (edited by G Oppert, London, 1893), the Unādigana-sūtra of Hemacandra (edited by J Kirste, Vienna, 1895); the Dictionaries of Apte (Poona, 1890), of A A. Macdonell (London, 1893), of C Cappeller (Strassburg, 1891); Whitney's Roots, Verb-forms, and Primary Derivatives of the Sanskrit Language (Leipzig, 1885), Lanman's Noun-inflection in the Veda (New Haven, 1880); Jacob Wackernagel's Altindische Grammatik (Göttingen, 1896), Delbrück's Altindische Syntax (Halle, 1888); Regnaud's Rhétorique Sanskrite (Paris, 1884); Lévi's Théatre Indien (Paris, 1890), Macdonell's Vedic Mythology (Strassburg, 1897), &c

For Vedic interpretation Roth and Grassmann have been the chief authorities, but it will be seen that neither Sāyana nor such modern interpreters as Pischel and Geldner in Vedische Studien (Stuttgart, 1889–1897), and Bloomfield for the Atharva-veda (in S B E, vol xlii) have been neglected

The Buddhistic portion of the Dictionary has chiefly been enriched by the following.—Aśvaghosha's Buddha-carita (edited and translated by Professor E. B. Cowell of Cambridge); Divyâvadāna (edited by Cowell and Neil, Cambridge, 1886), Jātaka-mālā (edited by H Kern, Boston, 1891), the two Sukhāvatī-vyūhas (S B E., vol xlix) and the Dharma-saṃgraha (Anecdota Oxoniensia, 1885) It is evident, that until new and complete Pāli and Prākrit Dictionaries are published the idiomatic Sanskrit used by Buddhists and Jains and the authors of certain inscriptions cannot be dealt with satisfactorily.

Of course many portions of the Indische Studien (edited by Professor A Weber of Berlin) have been consulted, and valuable aid has been received from some of the translations contained in the 'Sacred Books of the East,' as well as from many other works, the names of which will be found in the List of Works and Authors at p xxxiii

As to the books used by myself, many of them, of course, are identical with those named above Others are named in the first edition, and need not be referred to again here I ought, however, to repeat that some of the words marked MW in the present edition rest on the authority of the Sabda-kalpa-druma of Rādhā-kānta-deva (published in eight volumes at Calcutta in the Bengālī character). I am also, of course, responsible for some words and meanings taken from my own books, such as 'Brāhmanism and Hindūism,' 'Buddhism,' 'Indian Wisdom' (see note 1 to p xi of Preface), my Sanskrit Grammar and Nalôpâkhyānam (with vocabulary, published by the Delegates of the Oxford University Press), text of the Sakuntalā (with index and notes, published by the same), as well as from the notes appended to my English translation of the Śakuntalā (published by Messrs Harmsworth among Sir John Lubbock's hundred best books of the world), &c

The conjunct consonants are too numerous to be exhibited above, but the most common will be found at the end of 'A Practical Sanskrit Grammar by Monier-Williams,' published by the Delegates of the Clarendon Press, fourth edition.

For the correct pronunciation of the aspirated consonants, kh, ch, ṭh, th, ph, &c., see p. xxix, note † of the foregoing Introduction.

Observe that ṇ represents the true Anusvāra in the body of a word before the sibilants and h, as in aṇśa, aṇsa, aṇhati; m as the symbol of any nasal will often be found at the end of a word, as in dānam ca; but may also represent Anusvāra, when final m is followed by initial semivowels, sibilants and h, and in words formed with preposition sam, like sam-veśa, sam-śaya, sam-hata; the word Sanskṛit is now too Anglicized to be written Saṃskṛit. Visarga, as a substitute for final s, is a distinctly audible aspirate, so that the h at the end of such a word as devaḥ must be clearly heard.
